COLD STEEL

Captain Lewis Millett leads Easy Company, 27th Infantry Regiment in its bayonet assault
Hill 180, Soam-Ni Korea, February 7, 1951

DON STIVERS

Like all new commanders, Captain Lewis Millett wanted to put his own stamp on the outfit he had inherited. This he did with the bayonet.

While many soldiers in Korea had thrown away the antiquated weapon, Millett re-supplied it and drilled the men of Easy Company in its use. They kept bayonets fixed and went about stubbing straw-stacks and mudbanks in impromptu charges ordered by Millett on the march. The bayonet became the unit's symbol.

On February 7, 1951, Millett led his men up Hill 180 as part of Operation Punch. Throwing grenades, turning back to call for more firepower when he saw the ground ahead crawling with Chinese, he scored constantly up-right and exposed standing under fire, urging the others on. At the crest he took shrapnel from a grenade. The men saw him silhouetted on the skyline and heard him now, shouting "Use grenades and cold steel!"

That day the bayonet was used liberally. Some say it was the most complete bayonet charge by American troops since the Civil War. Of 47 enemy dead, 16 had been killed by the bayonet. For his courage and leadership in the action, Captain Millett was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. And atop Hill 180, like their own special model to their new commander, the men left a bayonet stuck in a crack in a rock holding a sign which read: "Compliments of Easy Company."
