COLD STEEL
 This is a color illustration of four soldiers in a snowy, mountainous landscape. The soldier in the foreground is crouching, holding a rifle, and gesturing with his other hand. Behind him, three other soldiers are also crouching or moving forward, armed with rifles. The background shows snow-covered mountains under a cloudy sky. The illustration is mounted on a dark blue mat with a gold-colored frame. Below the illustration, there is a small circular seal and some text.

Don Stivers, 1964, Oil on Canvas, 35" x 30"

A Day of Honor
 by Don Stivers
 1964
 Oil on Canvas
 35" x 30"
 This painting depicts a scene from the American Civil War, showing soldiers in battle. The central figure is a soldier in a blue uniform, who is being helped up by another soldier. In the background, other soldiers are engaged in combat, and a large American flag is visible. The painting is set within a dark blue mat with a red border, and the entire piece is housed in a dark wooden frame. Below the painting, there are two circular medallions: one on the left and one on the right.

Minimum bid: $100

On the heels of the Battle of Gettysburg the Federal Army established headquarters in Culpeper, VA. Chief Quartermaster for the Second Corps, Lt. Col. Richard Batchelder was tasked with seeing that the 4,000 six-mule wagons filled with supplies reached their destination. Repelling Confederate Raider John Mosby's guerrillas at every turn, his gallant efforts won him a Congressional Medal of Honor.
